Invergordon is a small port town in Easter Ross, Highland council area, in the Scottish Highlands. Located on the northern shore of the deep, sheltered waters of the Cromarty Firth (an inlet of the North Sea), it sits approximately 23–25 miles northeast of Inverness. The town enjoys a strategic maritime position in one of Britain's deepest natural harbours, historically serving as a Royal Navy base and now as a key maintenance hub for North Sea oil rigs alongside its role as a major cruise ship port.

With a population of around 4,000, Invergordon serves a localised catchment in the rural Easter Ross area, while its cruise and port activities draw thousands of visitors annually to explore the wider Highlands. Transport links include Invergordon railway station on the Far North Line (with services to Inverness in about 50–55 minutes), proximity to the A9 trunk road for road access, and regular bus services (e.g., Stagecoach routes to Inverness). The port itself handles ferries and large cruise vessels, enhancing connectivity to the region.
